

Call for Papers

“The Great War and the Azores: from naval strategy to trench warfare”

Ponta Delgada, Azores – July, 13th-16th, 2017

Revista Micoelense, 1918 (BPARPD).

The Atlantic Ocean connects the western civilization in its banks, having in its center the archipelago of the Azores. Intensely contested since the discoveries, with the advent of the Industrial Revolution, with the mechanical propulsion and the economic and political rise of the USA, this ocean would know a commercial increase, based on a powerful market economy and a strong power of the financial capital, reinforcing even more its paper as a way of supplying the colonial raw materials, to the metropolises. The presence of powerful marines of war as merchants, with a modern naval industry of great capacity of production, becomes more and more its background scene, namely during World War I. By this view, the role of the Atlantic during the Great War would include the importance of maritime commerce and the need to protect commercial traffic from a Europe at war, taking the consequences of disturbing the enemy, as well as the use of a network of submarine cables with branches all over the world. The entry of the United States in World War I marked the end of the world's hegemony by the European continent, which lasted three centuries, changing the symmetries in the center of the Atlantic.

To enter the war, besides protecting the great commercial route that the Atlantic represented and reinforcing (or cutting) the logistics of the continental war, implied the preservation of a set of interests of this Atlantic community, identical in the necessities and objectives.

This concept, despite having in the second account, a defense concept predominantly geared to land threats, would draw attention to the urgency of preventing trade by sea and the very backs of the belligerents, not only as a way of replenishing but also by the possibility of a successful attack on their rear or flanks. The advent of aeronautics would reinforce this change of policy towards the Atlantic islands, clearly evidenced by the installation of a US naval base in Ponta Delgada, and the passage of Commander Read with its NC 4 in 1919, legitimizing the importance of the archipelago at the heart of Aviation in the North Atlantic.

This meeting aims to analyze the relationship of the Atlantic, with particular emphasis on the Azores, the complex logistical support to the belligerents, regardless of the stage of war being European or colonial, and the multiple dynamics involved, whether political, economic, ideological or geographical. Likewise, it seeks to value and dignify not only the memory of those who act as, but the material and immaterial heritage, in the year in which the bombing of the main Azorean city and the creation of a foreign naval base in its territory is evoked.

The organizing committee calls for proposals that address, but are not limited to, the following themes:

- The maritime and terrestrial dimension of the Azores, in World War I;
- Naval and submarine warfare;
- The Atlantic and the communications during the Great War;
- Maritime connections in the Trench Wars, or in the colonies;
- The internal front: the impact of World War I in the Azores;
- War and Memory;
- Museology and Military heritage.

Submission: 5th February to 1st April, 2017.

Submission process: Please send your identification (name, institutional affiliation and mail address), Paper title, Abstract (maximum 700 words), and academic CV (1 page) via mail to: azoreswar@gmail.com

Working languages: English, Portuguese (no simultaneous interpretation is available).

Organization Committee

Ana Paula Pires (IHC-FCSH-UNL e Universidade de Stanford)

Annette D. Amerman (Marine Corps History Division)

Jakob Zollmann (Berlin Social Science Center)

Rita Nunes (IHC-FCSH-UNL e Comité Olímpico de Portugal)

Sérgio Rezendes (IHC-FCSH-UNL e Universidade dos Açores)

Scientific Committee

António Paulo Duarte (IDN e IHC-FCSH-UNL)

Carolina García Sanz (Universidade de Sevilha)

Filipe Ribeiro de Meneses (Universidade de Maynooth)

Luís Manuel Vieira de Andrade (Universidade dos Açores)

Maria Inès Tato (CONICET e Universidade de Buenos Aires)

Jorge Augusto Paulus Bruno (Museu de Angra do Heroísmo)

Honor Committee

Vasco Alves Cordeiro, ex.º Presidente do Governo Regional dos Açores

Christof Weil, ex.º Embaixador da República Federal da Alemanha

Robert A. Sherman, ex.º Embaixador dos Estados Unidos da América

José Manuel Bolieiro, ex.º Presidente da Câmara Municipal de Ponta Delgada

João Luís Gaspar, ex.º Reitor da Universidade dos Açores

Charles P. Neimeyer, ex.º Diretor do Marine Corps History Division

José António Feliciano de Figueiredo, ex.º Comandante da Zona Militar dos Açores

Valentim José Pires Antunes Rodrigues, ex.º Comandante da Zona Marítima dos Açores

Organization

UNIVERSIDADE
DOS AÇORES

Support

